When I came up with the crazy idea of leaving a secure job to do a PhD in linguistics, I had no real appreciation of what was in store for me. I soon discovered that writing a thesis can be a lonely and frustrating business, yet at the same time, quite wonderful. I was lifted through the dark days by the love and support of my family and friends. My greatest thanks go to my parents, Ann and Colin Snell, without whom I would never have come this far. They gave me all of the opportunities that they never had, and they continue to provide unconditional love and encouragement in everything I do. Special thanks must go to Ann for looking after me over the last few months in a way only a mother could. My sister, Joanna Snell, has given support in countless thoughtful ways over the years, and more than anything else, she just always believed in me. Thanks also to Rob Dotchin, Jane Hutchinson, Jackie Bolton, Jill Waring and Julie Thompson, especially Jill and Julie, who had to live with me and my thesis for the last year! Jill – you always knew the right thing to say.

I have been very lucky to have had the support of a wonderful supervisor, Anthea Fraser Gupta, who has been more generous with her time over the last three years than I could possibly explain. Anthea has been an inspirational mentor. She fought (and almost succeeded) to resolve my anxieties and self-doubts and made me believe in my own ideas (many of which were sparked through our discussions). She also reviewed drafts of my chapters with startling efficiency. I would also like to thank the following for their intellectual support, encouragement and guidance: Clive Upton, Emma Moore, Joan Beal, Ben Rampton, Michael Hoey.

I would like to thank the School of English at Leeds for a full-fee bursary, without which I would have been unable to complete this thesis.

I am, of course, very grateful to the teachers and pupils of Ironstone and Murrayfield Primary who took part in this research. They welcomed me into their schools with warmth and generosity. The children taught me a lot (not just about language) and they made me laugh a lot (not just about language). Thanks to all of them for making the research so enjoyable.
